MURDER OR ACCIDENT?

A Man Found on the Railroad Track.

In a Terribly Rattled Condition.

BREWER, June 28. About half-past eleven last night the body of a man in an extremely rattled condition was found on the track of the Boston and Maine Railroad between Middle and Beach streets. The head was jammed between the wheels, both legs were severed from the body and together with the intestines and other parts were scattered along the track in both directions. The back of the head was smashed to a jelly and a long arm was broken. When found there was no clothing upon the body, but a portion of a shirt and a handkerchief which was tied around the neck, the other clothing being a pile near by. In the stomach is a little much resembling a bullet wound. This body has been recovered as that of James Hayes who has been stopping for the past month at Old Orchard, and for several days has been on a drunken spree. It is evident that the train-passing took place over the body. In order to afford opportunity to examine the head, for a bullet, which is thought to have caused his death, the coroner's jury adjourned till tomorrow.
